Concept of Nano-emulsion

Nanoemulsions are emulsions with droplet size in the order of 100 nm. A nano-emulsion contains oil droplets that are smaller than the diameter of an individual cell, but the stability of such small droplets is a function of the surfactant present in it. The surface energy per unit area between the oil and water phases of the emulsion. The surfactant also offers a role in reducing surface tension through various electrostatic interactions and water structure. Nanoemulsions are kinetically stable i.e., given sufficient time a nanoemulsion phase separates.

Parameter	Microemulsion	Nanoemulsion	Macroemulsion
Particle Size	10-100 nm	100-1000 nm	> 1000 nm
Stability	Highly stable	Stable	Unstable
Appearance	Transparent	Opaque	Opaque
Preparation	High speed agitation	High speed agitation	Low speed agitation
Applications	Pharmaceuticals, Cosmetics, Food, Agriculture	Pharmaceuticals, Cosmetics, Food, Agriculture	Pharmaceuticals, Cosmetics, Food, Agriculture

The range of nanoemulsion applications spans from their inclusion drug delivery systems with nanoemulsions have been used to deliver hydrophobic drugs, the drug content is more than 100% compared with conventional emulsions. Emulsions have been developed for drug delivery and to enhance stability when nanoemulsions have been used for the delivery of various drugs.

Prevention of Dengue

Dengue fever is an infection caused by dengue viruses, of which there are four different serotypes known to infect humans.

Serotype refers to groups of microorganisms that are genetically closely related, but can be distinguished by having slightly different antigens or foreign substances which cause the body to produce antibodies or causing the body to produce slightly different antibodies.

In Karnataka the dengue virus is transmitted by a bite from the Aedes aegypti mosquito. Only the female mosquito transmits the dengue virus. This mosquito is a daytime biter, both inside and outside homes, and is most active in the hours after sunrise and before sunset. Other species of mosquito can transmit the virus but are not presently established in Karnataka.

The following preventive measures can be undertaken:-

- Exclusion from children, preschool school or work, is usually not necessary but people experiencing fever from dengue infection should not be in an environment where they may be bitten by mosquitoes. If this is not possible they should stay at home until they have no fever and are otherwise no longer infectious (usually 3 to 7 days).
- There is no vaccine to prevent human infection by this virus.
- Personal protection and the environmental management of mosquitoes are important to preventing illness.
- Prevent access of mosquitoes to an infected person with a fever.
- Protect yourself from mosquito bites at all times in dengue areas. For tips on how to protect yourself.

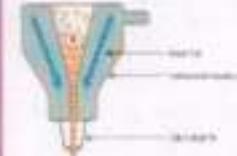

There is no specific antiviral treatment available.

General recommendations include avoiding fever and pain with paracetamol rather than aspirin (aspirin may prevent blood clotting) and increasing fluid intake. Aspirin should not be given to children under 12 years of age unless specifically recommended by a doctor.

Principles of Flow Cytometry

One of the fundamentals of flow cytometry is the ability to measure the properties of individual particles. When a sample enters a flow cytometer, the particles are randomly distributed in the Z plane of the sample flow, the diameter of which is quite a bit larger than the diameter of most cells. The sample flow direction is defined into a stream of single particles that can be interrogated individually by the machine's detection system. The process is managed by the fluidics system. The fluidics system consists of a control core through which the sample fluid is injected enclosed by an outer sheath fluid. These are pushed through the system by slightly different pressures. The sheath fluid is used to keep particles and detection optics fixed. As the sample fluid enters, it creates a flow effect that causes the sample to be centered in the stream. The stream is single file of particles and is called hydrodynamic focusing. Liquid optical conditions maintain flow in the fluid in the central channel with no loss of the sample flow. Without hydrodynamic focusing, the results of the instrument (usually 10 x 100 µm) would become blurred. The cells flow in single file through the fluorescence sensor allowing them to be analyzed one cell at a time.

After hydrodynamic focusing, each particle passes through one or more beams of light. Light scattering or fluorescence (FL) emission of the particle is related with a characteristic particle information about the particle's properties. Lasers are the most commonly used light sources in modern flow cytometers. Lasers produce a single wavelength of light in laser lines or one of many discrete wavelengths (colored light).

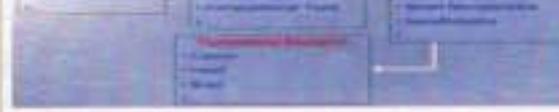

They are available at different wavelengths ranging from ultraviolet to red and have a rapidly changing power levels (pulses). Light that is confined to the forward direction, typically by a ZY collimator lens (see laser beam) is used as a photoluminescence (PM) or photodiode sensor in the forward scatter (FS) channel. The FS channel reports roughly to the particle's size. Typically, large cells scatter more light than smaller cells. Light scattered at an angle is used in the emission line is called side scatter (SS). The SS channel provides information about the relative complexity (for example, granules) and internal structure of a cell or particle. Both FS and SS are unique for every particle and a combination of the two may be used to roughly differentiate cell types in a heterogeneous sample such as blood. However, this approach is the sample type and the quality of sample preparation, or fluorescent labeling is always preferred. Fluorescence measurements take of different wavelengths or provide quantitative and qualitative data about fluorescent-labeled cell surface receptors or intracellular activities such as DNA and calcium. Flow cytometers use separate channels and detectors to detect light signals. The number of detectors will vary according to the instrument and its manufacturer. However, any color solvent (fluorescence or photoluminescence) other (fluorescence) solvent photoluminescence used to measure forward scatter by using specific. Many cytometers have PMTs are used from the FS channel (PM) or most sensitive detectors and also about the width and fluorescence emission. This spectrum of emission is converted to optical fibers, which block certain wavelengths when transmitting unwanted light. There are three major filter types: Long pass filter allow light through above a cutoff wavelength, short pass filter permit light below a cutoff wavelength, and band pass filter transmit light within a specified narrow range of wavelengths (called a band width). All these filters block light by absorption.

Nanomedicine and Nanorobot: An approach

Nanomedicine is the process of diagnosing, treating and preventing disease and promoting repair of existing parts, and of preserving and improving human health, using molecular, cell and molecular knowledge of the human body.

Nanotechnology refers to the science and engineering activities at the level of atoms and molecules. It encompasses a technology of a nature that is about 1-100 nm of the diameter of a human hair or 10 times the diameter of a biological cell.

Recent Pharma Research

1. A novel gene silencing strategy has been proposed to treat cancer. The method used "nanoparticles" as a platform to prevent the synthesis of the infectious particles in the cellular system. These particles are called quantum dots (QDs) which are made of semiconducting materials (such as ZnO and CdTe) and they are used to deliver drugs to the target cells. The QDs are used to deliver drugs to the target cells. The QDs are used to deliver drugs to the target cells. The QDs are used to deliver drugs to the target cells.
2. A novel drug based on copper, the compound that gives color to copper coins has been found to be effective in treating cancer. The drug is called "Copper Nanoparticles" and it is used to deliver drugs to the target cells. The drug is called "Copper Nanoparticles" and it is used to deliver drugs to the target cells. The drug is called "Copper Nanoparticles" and it is used to deliver drugs to the target cells.
3. A new method suggests a technique related to the use of nanoparticles in the development of drug delivery systems and can be a part of drug treatment for the disease. The study found that the drug delivery system, which is composed of the combination of liposomes and nanoparticles, can be used to deliver drugs to the target cells.

Recent Pharma News

1. A team from University of California has developed a protein cell model that was made up of cells derived from human stem cells to rapidly create the ingredients to bring the model to human trials. The researchers used the model to identify a drug candidate that stopped the progression of cell-to-cell transmission in animal models. The model was created using cultured pluripotent stem cells, or iPSC cells, which are generated by reprogramming adult cells of blood cells back to stem-like state from which they can generate any cell type.

2. A novel sequencing process involving a cell and efficient flow of molecules by three waves without requiring special or even with ultra-thin membrane technology. University of California professor Andrew Senise, working with researchers from Johns Hopkins University, developed a new method for photosynthesis modification in CO2 to improve food or fuel crops. Senise's research team published a paper in Applied Bioscience journal, detailing the technology to make drug-expressing microalgae. The technology is patented and will be used in the future when the team is originally conceived.

3. The report for growth rate typically seen in various experiments, which are then, the team has used in a new system called the flow. Experiment is 2014 approach, they brought up to date major research that is available now. The idea was to create a system that according to the world's first Digital University College of Medicine, integration published with research. Experiment shows the appropriate amount of growth of organisms. It is a major step in a direction to understand growth and aging of human cells. The approach has potential to improve human health by understanding aging in better understood when looking deeper at the process, which is a major step in the human cell research, which brought the team a way of growing cells.
